Acknowledgments

Thanks to my grandmother, Sylvaine Landrion, for bestowing upon me this love for languages. I would have never embarked on this lengthy journey if it wasn't for that one year of Ancient Greek...

Thanks to Sacha Levesque for making the cover and back-cover! The deadline was less than a month away when I inquired about the cover, which certainly was not the most professional thing to ever happen... Again, thank you!

And finally thanks to my parents for pushing me to finish this damned project before its very daunting deadline.

Preface

When I started working on this language, I had no idea how long it would take me, since all my previous projects of the type never reached completion. Some questions about this book will find their answers here.

This book is a most importantly a translation of a short story I wrote for the occasion into Serain, a conlang which served as my senior highschool project. The work spanned from August 2025 to May 2026. The assignment consisted of designing and completing some personnal project over the year and presenting the creation process and the final result — in this case, the very book you are holding. Later sections will explain the approaches taken to make the language.

The word conlang is short for constructed-language, and it describes a language which someone made either for fun, or to serve an actual purpose. There are many types of conlangs, like auxlangs which are short for auxiliary-language (Esperanto, is the most famous), but this one is an artlang (the most famous being Tolkien's many languages in Lord of the Rings). A section on HOW TO MAKE A LANGUAGE containing resources for this very purpose was included at the end of this book for those who are interested. Please note this is not my first conlang; this is, in fact, my third. You should expect neither beginner nor expert work, but something residing inbetween.

I don't believe this book should be read linearly (from start to finish). Some sections like the should only be used as reference when need be such as the lexicon, translation, and the original text in the language.

Square brackets are for International Phonetic Alphabet (IPA), angled brackets represent graphemes (characters/glyphs), and slashes are used for phonemic representation of words. For example, the word written <thou> can roughly be pronounced /ðəʊ/, French speakers (who usually have trouble with the [ð] sound) would likely pronounce the word as [ɖaʊ] (in my dialect), or [zaʊ] (in France). When IPA characters are not intuitive for English speakers, I will include a sample pronunciation as in [ʃ] (sheep). Sometimes quotation marks are used in the angled brackets' stead when it is not related to orthography.

Design Process of Serain

Making a language is not something that can be done overnight; even the simplest of decisions can take hours of research and consideration. To accomplish this project, I had to do more planning than I've ever done.

My biggest regret regarding Serain is not picking a natlang for inspiration.

Why Make a Language?

It might (or likely) seems like an odd project, to create a language, hence, the first thing I should answer is why this was chosen for this senior year project instead of some regular cookbook.

The reality is that I started working on this project before the assignment was given. My previous language had been quite a weird one and I wanted to have another go at conlanging. To give more details, my previous language used a logographic writing system (think of Chinese characters) which was turned into a digital font; after designing some hundred characters, I spent the entirety of my time on the project working on a dictionary, which sure was interesting, but was also completely unrelated to the conlang itself.

Then, the assignment was given: complete a project of your choice which yields a physical result in a year of time. Wanting to work on this conlang either way, this was the logical choice.

Goals, Ideas & Constrains

My goals with this project were the following:

- Create a naturalistic diachronic artlang. This was completed only partially... The word diachronic in this context means that the language changes and evolves over time, which was simulated, but the approach taken wasn't exactly good. The conlangs I have made in the past lacked much realism and would likely never occur in an actual conworld ; this one isn't so much better...

The original idea was to make a synthetic language that became more and more agglutinative (if not isolating) as it evolved¹. In the end, the diachrony was flipped around, where Classical-Serain the most synthetic.

Naturalism comes with irregularity which does exist to some way with verb conjugations, but not nearly enough for a real naturalistic conlang.

1 In more details, an agglutinative language combines multiple morphemes (units of meaning) together, like Japanese or German. A synthetic language, on the other hand, has less morphemes per words, like French or Latin, where single morphemes convey more information. An isolating language lacks much inflection and conveys meaning through context and particles, like Mandarin.

To simulate natural evolution, a language family was formed. It was named after the classical pronunciation of the name of the language (the trailing /ə/ appended after the word's adoption). When I use the noun phrase Classical-Seraine, I mean the language with this specific name. Serain refers to the language family. The abbreviations classical and proto may be used likewise to refer to the respective languages.

- Alphabet. I have made multiple writing systems in the past for conlanging projects (alphasyllabary, abugida, logography), but the simple alphabet is avoided, which I wanted to change in this project.
- Translate a short story. At first, I thought of translating Ryunosuke Akutagawa's Rashomon, but it was later decided to translate a story which I myself wrote. The story itself was made after I read Osamu Dazai's No Longer Human, which lead me to think about how different cultures sense certain sensible topics like that of self-alienation. Isn't it interesting how Japanese literature has a so much more of this genre centered around some variant of nihilism? This is the reason I started learning Japanese around a year ago — to read untranslated Akutagawa short stories, perhaps making translations of my own in the (distant) future — making slow yet steady progress to this day.

- Time. Since this project is originally an assignment, there is an immutable deadline which must be met.
- Æsthetics. I'll mention æsthetics at the beginning of every futher subsection as it was a very central goal in my original plan. Grammar can be æsthetically pleasing, believe me!
- Morphosyntax. My original plan mentionned an ergative–absolute language, which could have been derived from ancient tripartite system, but was amended for the classic nominative–accusative system (much more realistic and saved me a whole lot of time in translation, the latter being the reason behind the decision).

Phonology Design

Phonology are the sounds of a language.

My objective with the phonology was to have something that had a lot of fricative (hissing) sounds. Some of my favorite sounds are [ð] (thou) and [ɸ] (not present in English, sounds like an [f] and a [h] mixed, “who”-ish), which are both very rare in the world's languages, which probably contributed to making Serain even less naturalistic.

Diphthongs (two sounds gliding from one to the other) were present in the proto language, but monophthongization (a sound change that turns diphthongs into single sounds) occurred. Sounds in hiatus (two vowel sounds next to each other, like in “hiatus”...) on morpheme boundaries do occur but rarely.

The phonological inventory was pretty minimalist in the protolang but expanded over time and reached a satisfying point in my eyes. I am quite happy with the phonology of Classical Seraine, except for the nasal rows which I find unsatisfying because of nasal assimilation which I could not decide whether the difference should be phonetic or phonemic (settled on phonemic).

Regarding prosody, the Shaeshsae language was my approach. Shaeshsae underwent tonogenesis which were reinterpreted as stress in Classical Seraine. Well, that's the theory... Because, in truth, I stopped working on prosody after finishing tonogenesis in Shaeshsae for the sake of the time constraint.

The sound changes from proto to ancient to classical are messy, since it was the first time I ever worked on this aspect of conlanging. I did not use real sound changes as reference and only used them to reach my goals.

Phonotactics (how sounds are allowed to fit next to one another) are pretty unrestrictive in Classical Seraine, but they were a lot more controlled in the protolang.

Morphology & Syntax Design

Morphology is the language's grammar rules. I sought the grammar to be completely regular in my original plan, which is the case, in some way. To not go into the full details, verbs can be one of four types which are irregular as they are determined by features of the verb. For a native speaker, this would likely not even be studied as an irregularity. Since other parts of speech are completely regular, this goal was fulfilled.

At first, I tried to construct an exotic grammar using rare features, but the result was overwhelmingly unnaturalistic... In an attempt to make Serain not fit into the classics, I actively moved away from my goals. In this end, Classical-Seraine was simplified to resemble either French or English to shorten translation.

As for the syntax, the idea was to make something more regular (like Japanese), but the final result is basically undocumented and freestyled.

The morphosyntactic alignment in Classical-Seraine is nominative–accusative (in other words, the norm in languages with cases; think Latin, German, Ancient Greek...), but Ancient-Serain was a lot more complex, using an extremely rare alignment which made the language family even more unnaturalistic.

Script Design

The writing system evolved from runes carved on trees, which explains the vertical writing. The glyphs got more curved as the writing medium changed. The script is written from top-to-bottom and left-to-right; you may consult the text at the very beginning of this book as a reference to the writing system.

It is an alphabet — I have already explored others more exotic types of scripts and wanted to stay with simplicity here.

After making some asemic drafts, the main concept was formalized: to have a lot of ligatures (characters that connect, like the glyph Æ which has the fancy name ash) which I absolutely love. If characters can connect, they do: for instance, ⟨𐌶𐌿⟩ and ⟨𐌶⟩ form ⟨𐌶𐌿⟩ or the relative marker /rǣf/ which combines ⟨𐌶𐌿𐌶𐌿⟩ into ⟨𐌶𐌿𐌶𐌿⟩. When it comes to calligraphy, the ligatures are always ad libitum (which was the idea when designing the neography).

The digital font you are seeing was hand-drawn over the course of two months whilst I worked on conjugation tables for Classical Seraine; making the ligatures was, believe it or not, very tedious.

When it comes to punctuation, there is the dot ⟨.⟩ which marks the end of a sentence, the hyphen ⟨_⟩ which marks a pause in speech, the equivalent of the comma or the em-dashes, the tilda ⟨..⟩ which functions like quotation marks to indicate speech, and the separator ⟨_..⟩ which functions like a colon.

Analysis of Classical Seraine

Phonology

Elements of English (dental fricatives) and Japanese (bilabial fricative and its lack of a voiced counterpart) were taken for inspiration for this inventory. Vowels were kept simple and symmetric.

Table 1: Vowel Inventory of Classical Seraine

	FRONT	MIDDLE	BACK
CLOSE	/i/		/u/
CLOSE-MID	/e/		/o/
MID		/ə/
NEAR-OPEN		/ä/

There are no diphthongs, but vowels may be in hiatus, especially with inflections and compounding.

The bilabial fricative originates from lenition of the proto labiodental fricative. Other proto consonants like /m/ and /v/ both disappeared around that time, which is somewhat unnaturalistic, I believe.

Nasal assimilation was thoroughly applied in Ancient-Serain.

Proto-Seramin had only four vowels and its consonant inventory resembled closely that of PIE (Proto-Indo-European) which was its inspiration.

Table 2: Consonant Inventory of Classical Seraineⁱ

	BLB	DNT	ALV	PLA	PAL	VEL	GLT
NAS			/n/
STP	/p ^h / /p [̥] / /b/		/t ^h / /t [̥] / /d/			/k ^h / /k [̥] / /g/
AFR			/ts/			/tʃ/
FRC	/ϕ/	/θ/ /ð/	/s/ /z/	/ʃ/ /ʒ/			/h/
FLP			/r/
APR					/j/	/w/

Proto-Seramin did not have a phonemic voiced–voiceless distinction in plosives. There indeed was a distinction, but only a phonetic one which only became phonemic in Ancient-Serain. The aspirated series evolved in Ancient-Serain from the following sound change:

[+plosive, -voice, -aspiration] → [+plosive, -voice, +aspiration]h / C_V

From this evolved the voiced–aspirated–tenuis distinction in plosives of Classical-Serain. Fricatives always had the voiced–voiceless distinction, from proto to classical.

The /r/ phoneme has the /r/ allophone in classical which occurs within words. There is only one nasal, the /n/, but it has many allophones due to nasal assimilation. Another one of these allophones is the /w/ which has the very unnaturalistic variant /ʍ/ which occurred from the sound change:

w → ʍ / [-voice]_V

When making Proto-Seramin, I wanted it to be at least a tiny bit different, which is why I decided to omit approximants — which was very unnaturalistic since approximants are found in basically all of the world's languagesⁱⁱ (there was the rhotic /r/ which then became a flap in Ancient-Serain). Diphthongs containing /i/ and /u/ then became /y/ and /w/ respectively in Ancient-Serain.

Shaeshsae is the entry in the language family with the least development since its only purpose is the prosody of Classical-Seraine. Shaeshsae underwent tonogenesis, which was later reinterpreted as pitch accent in Classical-Seraine. Proto-Seramin had logical stress accent on the penultimate syllable.

Morphology

Nouns both common and proper decline on three numbers (SG, PAU and PL), five cases (NOM, ACC, GEN, DAT, LOC), no gender nor definiteness and have no clitics. Adjectives decline in agreement using the same paradigm.

Table 3: Functions Related to Grammatical Cases

CASE	FUNCTION
NOM	Subject of clauses
ACC	Direct object of clauses
GEN	Possessum (head of PossP) and noun roots (e.g. when talking about the language using the language)
DAT	Indirect object of clauses, noun complements
LOC·ADP	Marks location in space or time when not associated with an adposition (LOC forms AdvP, thus head-final), adpositional case otherwise. From a merge of Ancient-Serain's GEN and DAT in adpositional contexts.

Proto-Seramin only had four cases: NOM, ACC, GEN, and DAT. Ancient Serain had an intransitive case in the locative's stead which merged with the nominative in Classical Serain. Locative is a weird one: after Ancient Serain adpositions, nouns took either the genitive or dative (like in Ancient Greek), which merged into classical locative. Thus, the locative case is also an adpositional case; more precisely, it replaces the nominative in adpositional contexts like the following:

for	the honor of	them
ADP	GEN=SG	ADP=PL=AN
ϕjunə	enisðe	nəðəripso

Or:

before	he	replied	by	nodding
ADP	ADP=SG=AN	3PST=PFV=3P	ADP	ADP=SG
hitkhäk	nəðəris	ətmäk	zugä	zuϕfeji=əs

Table 4: Nominal and Adjectival Morphology of Classical Seraine

	SG	PAU	PL
NOM	-i	-ib	-t
ACC	-winə	-ub	-unə
GEN		-əb	-t
DAT	-is	-ips	-s
LOC	-əs	-əps	-ts

Verb morphology tables are in the APPENDICES section. Verb conjugate over five tense-aspect combinations (past perfective, past imperfective, present (imperfective), future perfective and future imperfective), two voices (active, passive), and six moods (indicative, subjunctive, imperative, gerund, participle, infinitive), and have an adjectival form. They also conjugate on person and number (paucal is merged with plural) The subjunctive and imperative moods are both defective in their own ways: subjunctive only have a past–non-past distinction whilst imperative does not decline on anything beside number and voice.

Verbs are divided into four groups:

1. Older verbs, auxiliary verbs mostly;
2. Intransitive verbs (and verbs with zero-transitivity);
3. Transitive or ambitransitive verbs;
4. Irregular verbs (such as /hək/ “To be”).

This originates from the distinct tripartite morphosyntactic alignment of Ancient Serain which itself originated from a simplification of the proto /kuni/ (particle which marks passive voice) to /n/ in Late-Proto-Seramin’s onto the NOM inflection pattern:

The rain	will be stopped	soon
NOM=SG	FUT=PFV=PASS	ADV
rənəs=i	n (kuni) tsiv=fəviz	fäiksə

From this, the intransitive case paradigm is derived in Ancient-Serain: /-in/, /-ibun/, /-idun/.

In a way, Ancient-Serain had morphosyntactic verb groups, which became morphological.

Classical Seraine (and the entire language family) is a null-subject language, which is always applied on zero-transitive verbs such as /rənəsfo/ “To rain”.

Here are some grammatical constructions:

- Negative form: circumparticle /hu ... tsu/ from Proto-Seramin /u/, negative particle, and Ancient-Serain /tsu/ “Very, too” (which is also a word in classical, used very idiomatically);
- Causative: postparticle /e/ from Proto-Seramin auxiliary /je/ “To act”;
- Casual imperative: Drop subject, IMP mood.
- Polite imperative: Optionally drop subject, SUBJ mood.
- Interrogation: postparticle /ði/ from Proto-Seramin auxiliary /tzi/ “To ask”. Ancient-Serain’s verb inflected on the interrogative mood, which was later lost in Classical-Seraine.
- Yes-no questions: interrogative sentence and /te/ appended to the sentence.
- Casual emphasis: postparticle /rədä/ appended. This could be considered cursing.

Miscellanea

The language is SVO at its core and mostly head-initial. AdjP, PossP are head-initial. AdvP, CtrP are head-final. The possessum is marked with the genitive case, hence the form Gen+X for PossP.

Counters are adverbial when uninflected and nominal when inflected. They are preceded by a numeral and optionally an adverb and or adjective to form the following syntax:

(Adj) Num (Adv) Ctr+(inflection if nominal)

See as in:

and	during	the Vth	century,
		NUM	CTR(nominal)=ADP=SG
nwi	gju	tniptse	eotwi=əs

Compounding is head-initial, thus the first morpheme should indicate its part of speech, although this is not standard and switches around.

So-called adpositional verbs can be derivated in the form Adp+Verb as to create new verbs like English to move away for instance.

A very miscellaneous feature of Classical-Seraine is how interjections are an open-class, as adverbs can freely be used.

Phonotactics are very (very) loosely defined in Classical-Seraine as (C)³V(C). The pattern /n/ in word final contexts is forbidden and is fixed through the sound change:

$$n \rightarrow n\emptyset / _ \#$$

Phonotactics of Proto-Seramin was strictly defined, but many sound changes in the diachrony made is a lot looser. Proto was (C)²V(C), did not accept geminates, /r/ never clustered and was never a coda. Various onset clusters which violated the sound hierarchy were forbidden.

Reflection and Self-Critique

I have compiled this list of regrets, things I wish I had done or following through when creating this language family:

- Not picking a natlang for inspiration. Tolken famously based his Elvish languages off Finnish and Welsh for their grammar (Quenya does not have vowel harmony, a central feature of Finnish; Latin and Italian were used as phonetic reference). Picking a real-world language as reference ensures features are naturalistic and proved to be physically possible, which is a great help.
- Not being thorough enough in my translation. When reformatting the hundred or so pages, I found way too many mistakes which I did not correct as the final translation was already completed and written into the script. These mistakes show a lack of care in proper work (I translated late into the night, past midnight and often until one or two in the morning...) which I regret not reviewing more thoroughly before committing to a final copy.
- Not aiming for naturalism first in phonology and morphology. There are four main points in phonology:

Firstly, the disappearance of /m/ and /v/ phonemes in Ancient-Serain. Secondly, the omission of approximants in Proto-Seramin. Thirdly the baseless sound changes throughout the language’s diachrony. I have not showed all these sound changes as I am not exactly proud of them; they are beginner work with not real-world reference. Unsatisfied with Proto-Seramin phonology, I used sound changes as a tool to change the phonological inventory from A to B, although I believe it should be used not to modify, but to enhance. Classical-Seraine finished in a good state, but its history is very unrealistic. Finally, the voiceless labial–velar approximant, very rare in the world’s languages. As for morphology, Ancient-Serain morophosyntax is the obvious outlier,

Sum of Work?

One of the most common questions I was asked in the making of this project was “How much time did you spend on this?”; allow me to explain these using my memory and experience to approximate the time spent on each and every section and subsection. A summary table is placed at the end of the chapter.

I believe with this number lies a margin of ± 10 hours, but 271 hours look like an accurate number, especially when divided over a long period of time. Since this project was split across almost exactly 300 days, this amounts to under an hour of word daily, which matches the work given.

How to Make a Language?

Did reading the above section make you interested regarding creating a language of your own? Well this chapter wont tell you exactly what to do for two reasons: firstly, I am no linguist; secondly, making a language is something that cannot be done if you are not willing to search for answers to your own questions. I will give some resources and point out tips that have helped me in my journey through making languages. Here are some links I recommend you check out if you are ready to fall into the neverending rabbithole of conlanging:

- <https://en.wikibooks.org/wiki/Conlang>, a great resource for beginners, relatively complete. Has links to a lot of resources which will surely be of use.
- The Language Construction Kit, very complete book, although I do not own a copy myself. This is probably the best way (if a best way even exists...) to get into the hobby.
- <https://fiatlingua.org/wp-content/uploads/2014/08/fl-000024-01.pdf>, amazing document for deriving words.

- https://www.reddit.com/r/conlangs/comments/gljpvv/the_succinct_list_of_modality/, an amazingly complete post that lists different types of modality, I spent way too long searching for this myself, so here it is!
- <https://zompist.com/sca2.html>, simple and efficient sound change applier.
- https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/List_of_glossing_abbreviations, pretty exhaustive list of abbreviations used in glossing.
- <https://forum.unilang.org/viewtopic.php?t=48613>, complete post about verb morphology.
- <https://glossary.sil.org/term>, basically an exhaustive list of linguistic terms and definitions.
- <https://www.youtube.com/@Artifexian>, has made amazing conlanging tutorial videos, very recommended.
- <https://www.youtube.com/@Biblaridion>, another great conlanging youtuber. His How to Make a Language and is where I personally started my conlanging journey.

Thought personal experience, I find that studying natlang helps not only make naturalistic conlangs, but conlangs in general. It helps you knowing what to add when you think you're done (because there is no end). Even though I don't speak a word of Nepali, I can tell you it has very complex honorifics; I can tell you Swahili's animacy hierarchy groups lightning with its dieties. Of course, more thorough studying makes an even bigger difference: learning Ancient Greek is what made me want to make languages in the first place, and now learning Japanese made me realize how different languages can be. Don't limit yourself to languages of your native language's family: try straying from Indo-European languages, especially Germanic languages, since you are reading this text in a Germanic language.

If you are not interested in learning a language, try learning more about your native language. Even a native speakers does not know every detail a language holds.

Finally, I wish you the best of luck in your conlanging!

- ii According to the chart found at https://docs.google.com/spreadsheets/d/1VyNSrUl3vBATHG06QyIQS-MKoWCYBHsxrMrk0_Fzvnc/edit?usp=sharing, more than 85% of languages have the /j/ phoneme, and between 70-85% have /w/. The only language I could find that has no approximants is Cheyenne language part of the Algonquian language family, but since semivowels and vowels can be basically indistinguishable phonemically, I don't believe it is of any use to confirm any further research.
